

Coraddi

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2010 with funding from Lyrasis Members and Sloan Foundation

Coraddi

Fall 1994
Vol. XCIX
Number One

Editor-In-Chief

Jennifer Weaver

Production Manager

Rick Spencer

Literary Editor

Rebecca Johnson

Assistant Literary Editor

Gina Calloway

Art Editor

Stephanie Shaw

Assistant Art Editors

Verniesa Allen

Bobby Gold

Nonfiction Editor

Erin Stratford

Editorial Assistant

Kathryn Andrews

Faculty Advisor

Dr. Charles Tisdale

Coraddi is published by the University Media Board of The University of North Carolina at Greensboro. It is funded by the student body and distributed free.

Special thanks to: Dillon Johnston, The Cary, Betty Carter, Keith in Client Services, Christopher Schwarzen, Heather Mills, Oscar, Felicia Bond, Janice Thompson, Stuart Comfort, John Watson, Evan Smith, Ian McDowell, and "I love it because it's trash."

The following businesses graciously sponsored the Coraddi Poetry Contest: Davis Design, Atticus Books, UNCG Bookstore, The Exchange, and Cup-a-Joe.

Coraddi welcomes all creative or critical work mailed or delivered to Room 205, Box 11, EUC, UNCG, Greensboro, NC 27412. Nonfiction contest deadline is Halloween, 1994.

Printed by Jostens Publishing Company, Winston-Salem, North Carolina
Harry Thomas, Account Representative

Coraddi was established in March of 1897 as a literary quarterly of the State Normal and Industrial College. When the Normal became the North Carolina College for Women in 1919, the State Normal Magazine became Coraddi. The name Coraddi is a combination of the first letters of the three literary societies that edited it: Cor for Cornelian, Ad for Adelpian and Di for Dikeian. Previous issues of Coraddi can be found in the tower and in Special Collections of the Walter Clinton Jackson Library at UNCG.

Cover: Karen Ingram: Untitled, etching with aquatint

© Copyright Coraddi 1994

Contents

Poetry Contest Winners

- 5 Honorable Mention: My (Everybody's) Mother's Big Black Underpants Elizabeth Core 7 Honorable Mention: All Your Clothes Have Blown Away Lorrin Harvey 13 Third Place: My Brother-in-Law Speaks of Death S. Greene 17 Second Place: Now Anne Moore Odell
28 First Place: On the Seventh Day Jennifer Militello

Poetry

- 6 Letter to the King of the Sea Lorrin Harvey 8 Stray Seed Marcia Cox
10 Cross Stitch Marcia Cox 11 On Kersham's Bust of Medusa Graham Horton 14 Going to the Sun David Olson 15 An Oklahoma Birth David Olson 16 The Picnic Anne Moore Odell 19 The Yard Anne Moore Odell
20 School Desk Zachary Mull 21 Frosted Mathew W. Bryan 22 Only in America Kimberly Holzer
25 Raskolnikov Colin Mathews
26 Six Haiku A. Doren
27 First Dead Body Jennifer Militello

Art

- 4 220 North Elizabeth Core 12 Untitled Roger Goldenberg 18 Untitled Billy Hanes 24 Doubt/St. Salty Michael Andrew McNair 31 Untitled Karen Ingram

- 32 About the Judge: Dillon Johnston

ElizabethCore: 220 North, lithograph

Honorable Mention

My (Everybody's) Mother's Big Black Underpants Elizabeth Core

But even though the elastic is loose as the change you pocket, the briefs still reach over the line where you left your own mother alone, cover the small, round depression that could catch a peanut falling from its shell, looking for a place to collect salt. I think you thought black or space as you bought each pair, something to put sleep to rest. And like a teacher, marked the color absent, kept it brief, pulled a number on your hips, with some vague twilit area codes of lace. Black irony, big, long, wide like an elephant's foot, and your drawer gripping more dark drawn nylon wrappers that cover a range of values. Curtains of a tenant's space, they pull closed an open space and shadow the circle of my birth.

Letter to the King of the Sea

Lorrin Harvey

I first saw you at the end of the pier last summer as if you were a pale, sun-bleached sea king, thrown up by the waves, onto a lounge chair.
You watched the point where the sea meets the sky and breaks away.

I was the quiet girl, walking head down when the lights were turning on behind us, making shadows with the sea oats. My sister skipped from shell to darkening shell. Spotlit crabs waved, and backed into shadows.
Perhaps you remember how I glanced back over my shoulder.

What were you thinking when the wind began to blow, the lighthouse flashed, the sirens sounded?
All that remained was an unlocked beachhouse, the cruisers trawling back and forth, casting circles of light across the water.

You left your forwarding address in the sand, written in crab-scuttle lines.
May this letter sealed in its green vessel with a cork and a little wax, reach you intact.
I threw it off the pier you'd been pulled down from months ago. They say you'll never be found, but some nights I see your silhouette.

How far you can swim now,
Further than I can fish from this pier.
If you come and tug firmly on the line,
I will not resist, but dive to meet you.

Honorable Mention

All Your Clothes Have Blown Away

Lorin Harvey

Escapees from the clothesline, they careen to the meadow's edge, blown by the wind and captured in trees like strange birds.

What will you do now?
Hide in the dust under the bed when the men come to fix the sink, or turn them away, your body hidden, shy behind the wooden door.
The dripping faucet will keep you up all night.

The dogs groan behind the barn, hungry.
When your friend called, his voice was ragged as he asked if you'd gotten her letter.
Beyond the ocean of sunlight, by the highway, the red flag has dropped.

You wait until dark when you see the clothes ethereal on branches, flapping their drowsy arms.
Climb naked into trees to retrieve your socks, the towels, your old blue jeans.

The world is blue and the insects exclaiming. They too are unabashed.
And on the way back, how nice the moonlight feels on your skin, as you carry your clothes nestled in your arms.

Stray Seed
Marcia Cox

When she was a child her mother told her she must never eat the seeds of fruit. She feared the seeds could take root somewhere inside, could push and shove their feathery shoots up the latticework of ribs, and spill in curls of watermelon vine around her ears. With every seeded grape nearly swallowed whole, every apple bitten too close to the core, she buried a child's mute terror within, believed one morning, she would wake to the petaled nudge of tight-lipped cherry blossoms pressed against her teeth.

On the bad days, now, she imagines this is so, in the painful hours, dreams some alien seed has pierced the womb and lodged in the cradle stretched between her hips, flexes kudzu tentacles as if to twine throughout the body's honeycomb of cells.
She visualizes this intruder as it grips and climbs vertebrae by vertebrae up the spine, its leafy clutch the twinge she feels in every marrow and tissue and as if she were an inadvertent Eve, she cries what did I do? what did I do? what did I do?

She no longer sees the face reflected in the mirror as hers; it is a smooth flecked pear marred by its web of faint blue lines beneath the skin.

As nurses puncture veins, insert IVs, she feels as if she's trapped inside her childhood dream.
She counts the drops of poison inching through the needled vines and prays the poison will seek out, destroy the seed before it overtakes the garden.

Cross-Stitch

Marcia Cox

The day your daughter unpacked the linen I had so carefully tissueed, wrapped in ribbons I thought of your needle in that long ago summer flashing gold with each dive through the cambric; how strands of your hair swung with the movement, spun webs against your cheeks.
We sat out on the terrace, while the babies slept, working our threads into patterns, counting the stitches one by one.

The last summer of your life, sister, I watched the silken strands flowing out through your needle into their invisible seam.
We sat out on the terrace while I wept brushing the thin pale threads of your hair, counting the fibers one by one.
Near the end, your pattern completed, you folded your hands and I folded the linen away.

Tell me about my mother, your daughter says and I do, Imagining the needle, I pull you back through.

On Kersham's Bust of Medusa

Graham Horton

Her head lies on the snakes that were her hair.
The half unfinished stone makes no more stone of flesh, those serpents stilled. But she was fair as Venus, once. Her unloosened curls shone like gold before Olympus, whose angered maids made transformations. Her pale blue eyes, now closed by stone, saw all the games that young boys played for her. But who can say the altered form, who crept along the darkened caves of Seriphus, was not still fair? Her stone leavings may have worn those anguished looks in loving the mother of Pegasus, who roamed labyrinths so empty, and so dim, ever hunting statues, and never men.

Roger Goldenberg: Untitled, lithograph

Third Place

My brother-in-law speaks of death

S. Greene

My brother-in-law speaks of death in a low faltering voice. As fireman, he chats of wrecks or blazing housefires glibly, but when he speaks of death he circles words round it, and his slow calm voice is soft with tones he seldom takes. The fireman grows calloused to death, its forms and frequency; the man must face the harms beyond the dead: that death in coming breaks a family's home, a child's. So my sister's spouse speaks of death in abstracts, as statistics, not as veils and tears, as if realistic talk of it, unlike a storied burning house, should be concealed, words running rings outside, flames stamped down hiding bodies burnt inside.

Going to the Sun

David Olson

Below Logan Pass the glaciers had torn great walls in retreat, the valley's ribs left open to fill with rain and melt.

My father is buried just East, where my clan came against this range and said no further.

We had camped down there, the tent rattling under stars in the wind threading through passes.

You slept wrapped in dreaming of the prairie just ended.

On this journey the world came out like your clay:

glaze uncertain, colors retreating, bearing the tectonics of hands held still to pass the caress of leaving, the uneven radius of exploring the buried left behind, as though shedding towards some secret center smoothed by the friction of going:

a pot like yours

or a life like mine turning gently in the light.

An Oklahoma Birth

David Olson

Across the hard fields pearl with sun, crows drag jagged tracks in the sky where the summer grass fires rise in the twisting tornadoes of smoke.

When the fields across the road burned we stood and watched the rage taking trees and boiling the swamp.

Next day, walking the ruined land of ankle-deep ash we kicked skeletons of rabbits with small skulls and the twisting arc of snake bones, all too slow to escape the purging.

Next year, in the space left open and rich, in the new grass of sharp blades and the red tears of Indian paintbrush flowers we found old charred branches, new home to beetles and ants who when boring through the dead insides listened to the winds of the dead fires listened to the ancient rage whisper: change.

The Picnic

Anne Moore Odell

It is curious the way angels try sitting on the ground with their legs straight out in front and their stomachs folding.

They wiggle and look uncomfortable. They plant their fingers into the ground; they pull out grass, like the children do, and cry "tornado." At lunchtime, the angels take a little of everything offered although they cannot chew. Chewing is not like making love which the angels also like to pantomime; when the angels dry hump it is beautiful and close to life but when the angels chew, it is unearthly. They do it messily, shoving food through their heads, no saliva, teeth dysfunctional, no esophagus or intestinal tract.

The food stays untasted. The angels fan their wings slowly to keep from floating up; they imagine they are weighed to the ground. They eat, like the children do mud pies, with little grace.

Second Place

Now

Anne Moore Odell

1.

At the top of the path, you can look down at the entire lake. It is the same size as the huge dining room table in the hotel. The camps around the lake are astonishing. They are so hazardly arranged. They are so durable, so full of hope, to be filled with people born later. Of course, I don't dare reveal what I really think. Why should I? I stand by him, now, on the front steps of the hotel, going to lay down before the lunch bell. Don't we already know enough about each other?

2.

At the hotel, by the mountain lake, the two of us were sitting by another couple under the faded umbrellas. Nearby, a tiny girl splashed in the water. The sky was large with the shouts of boys racing sailboats. I, too, felt that rising in myself. It was noon and like no other. Now, when I sit by him, the vague summers of the past join us and the dishes that rested on the table, the foundation of the hotel washed by the lake. The two of us are astonished by our own thoughts and the scent of the water trees and the summer marigolds is with us.

Billy Hanes: Untitled, etching with aquatint

The Yard

Anne Moore Odell

A dog hit by a car dodges past you, her chest heaved open. Heads hang off their bodies like rotting buds.
Red flowers mark the unforgivable ground: lipstick on goat lips. Doctors advertise new infections, the cows line up and along the flaming fences, mourning monkeys.
The escapees, the new children, about face through the invisible gate and you cannot follow; they are naturalized; they grow feathers and fly out and up.
Yet you beg the guards. You make promises.
You lick your hide. You set up shop.
You hee-haw, but this is hell, hee-hee.

School Desk
Zachary Mull

Me?

I am the one without memories with a legacy of scars I've known dead boys and smart girls my lines are less deep my broken ribs, my missing links
Me?

I'm the one with "Fuck" on my face my wavy grain
I creak and moan
I have no memory except what you make of me, my legacy of scars
(and my service to the stars)

Frosted

Matthew W. Bryan

I'm floating angelic beneath my halo Looking down into an aquarian abyss
Occupied by moonshifting Taurians & the like Eyes shine ultrablue from below
I smell
Your soul
Simmering on low
I can taste ever so slightly Your mouth
on certain evenings
I could live in there
I know...

Beginning
the gentle descent I knock my head against the pillars of your trust and bleeding
I smile and believe...
Hall light illuminates Your sleepy form floorwise eyes half empty arms in a trance, stretched out I fall
Dropped like water into the embryonic warmness you dilute
In door shut black.

Only in America
Kimberly Holzer

Renegade Driving Woman
hair catching whatever flies by the window Cat Stevens prodding her along,
"If you want to be free, be free..."
on fifty-dollar speakers that give a general idea as to what's on the radio.
Life is too short to drive the speed limit in a terminally diagnosed Honda hatchback that wants to see the world before it dies, opting to bypass newly resurfaced safety-enhanced chicken-fried I-40 for a schizophrenic chronically neglected backroad that only fools or four-wheelers dare cross.
Stops to eat only where "diner" is spelled incorrectly, and service is guaranteed by Wanda, Cookie, or Mabel.
Where a hearty belch rivals a three-dollar tip in measures of love.

Everybody knows everyone except Renegade Woman, and they wonder why such a clean, healthy-looking girl drives alone on this man-eating stretch of highway. She watches the only real world pass by her windows where good old boys are where bullshit is fertilizer, and it smells kind of sweet.

That's the reason.
There's no reason at all.
Started from nowhere in no direction ended up somewhere that's not much but it's here.

A place to idle over a Slim Jim and trucker's blend coffee, filling her impatient hunger for stuff unfit for human consumption.
Another return to the road, and a new great American nowhere.

Michael Andrew McNair: Doubt/ St.Salty, etching with aquatint

Raskolnikov
Colin Mathews

My pellet gun was there in the corner.
I took it and a yellow box of ammo, and walked out the back door. No one saw me.
In the thick heat of afternoon, my shirt stuck to me. Past the fence, the canefield unrolled dry and dusty. I shuffled along, shooting up little clouds of dirt, until I saw in Mr. Boudreaux's yard the purple-martin house. No one would see me behind the fence. Looking up, I saw one, black against the white house. I shot him, and watched the blood wet his feathers. Then, quickly, I walked home, through the back door, straight to my room and stayed there awhile, thinking nothing.

Six Haiku

A. Doren

Amid Autumn mist
before morning awakens
Wind caught in silence

A sharp steady hum breaks the silence of night-time Cicada, I think

A startled marsh-hawk winging, takes to flight a cry from its beak

Beach plum plant in bloom Black ants scurry to and fro a Dragon-fly rests

With the day dying ocean waves rush frantically toward the late sun

As the sun lowers
I think with melancholy
Ah, it too must rest

First Dead Body
Jennifer Militello

When the nun died and her body was displayed in the rectory section of the school, the girl was led to view it by curiosity, fear, and the urging of classmates.
She was amazed at the stillness; it was not the curling of the self deep in the center nutshell of the body as in sleep.
This was vacant, empty;
there was no one anywhere inside.

The face of the ded sister ballooned in her mind until it pressed to the outside of her skull, filled her features.
An image stained itself there.
It is me, she thought.
She was lying still, dressed in black;
her hands were neatly folded across her chest.

First Place

On the Seventh Day

Jennifer Militello

1: the Child plays with his pudgy hands, can't see how they belong to him.

fingers close,
fat sausages.
He will learn his skin and toes belong to everyone else.
He can't understand why he's not inside those others instead.

2: the Man

wears black pants, shiny shoes,
irons precision into his shirts.
When he shaves he sees his eyes in the mirror before it whitens with steam.
The irises are brown and buffed like the leather of his briefcase.

3: Louise eats strawberries for breakfast, wears open-toed shoes, paints her toenails red.

She thinks she needs a private cafe, one for herself;
she loves the atmosphere,
hates the people at the table beside hers.
The men talk too much,
eat scones without delicacy;
the women leave lipstick stains on the cigarettes crushed out in ashtrays.

4: the Angel spreads his dark wings.
They lengthen like the shadows of trees at dusk.
Someone thinks they're the wrong color.
The picket fences around his house are missing teeth, smile with gap-toothed mouths.
He's been waiting for the repairman for years;
a few fresh boards,
a coat of paint, and the place will look like new.

5: the Parrot stands speaking on a lampshade, black tongue lifting like a dry worm.
Everything he says is an echo, a repetition of the only four words he knows.
If he was struck by a car, the only evidence would be a spot of blood and the feathers in the road.

6: the Woman knows she swells in places for a reason, feels if she hides the curves no one will know they're there; asexual is her goal.
She kisses men only when they ask her to,
never opens her mouth.

7: a God forms accidentally in the sky, is shaped in air, clouds, until the rain falls and the water vapor disperses, collects on the ground in puddles and rivers.
The people know it was formed by chance, didn't last,
still lingers in the green moisture gathered in veins, dripping from leaves, fragmented.

Karen Ingram: Untitled, etching with aquatint

About the Judge

Dillon Johnston is a professor of English at Wake Forest University, where he teaches courses on British and Irish literature, mostly poetry. He is the founding director of the Wake Forest University Press which since 1976 has been the leading publisher of Irish poetry in North America as well as publisher of French poetry in translation. Author of articles on poetry and a book, Irish Poetry After Joyce (1985), he currently is on leave in St. Louis where he is working on a book entitled The Economy of Modern British and Irish Poetries.

UNIVERSITY
ARCHIVES
UNCG